Additional Comment:

Galba's approach to the capital followed the suppression of the revolt of Nymphidius Sabinus. Claiming to be the son of Gaius (Caligula), and appointed by Nero as praefectus praetorio, Sabinus endeavored to further his own ambitions by employing these connections. After first inducing the Praetorian Guard to desert Nero for Galba with the promise of a sizeable donative, and subsequently pressuring his colleague and ally of Nero to resign, Sabinus consequently hoped to

Nero was the first of Rome's many emperors to be overthrown by force, and specifically by his own army, whose loyalty had shifted to the Spanish governor Servius Sulpicius Galba. Since Galba was hailed emperor while in the provinces, by an army stationed in the provinces, his revolt was also an important "first" in that an emperor was hailed outside of Rome and without the advance consent of the senate. This scenario would replay itself dozens of times throughout Imperial history. This rare

From Kraay's 'Officina G', one of the finest issues of sestertii ever produced by the mint of Rome, with portraits of superb style and many fascinating, multfigured reverse types. This is the only left-facing portrait die of the issue, compared to ten right-facing obverse dies. With four reverse dies attested, HONOS ET VIRTVS S C is the 'commonest' type of the issue, yet with portrait left it is rare, known to Kraay in only four specimens.
